Okay, I admit to a certain amount of skepticism about the usefulness of this item. It seemed to me that a bluetooth device designed solely to allow people to have more range in their selfies was one of those do-you-really-need-this-REALLY??? items that end up gathering dust in a closet. And honestly I'm still not sure it's a have-to-have device. But I'm going to guess that travelers will find it really useful. Imagine yourself at the edge of the Grand Canyon, or standing on the Eiffel Tower looking out over Paris, and you want to send a selfie to your friends to make them weep with envy. The process is fast and relatively painless... once you've figured out what the process is. The manual is not as helpful as you might like since it was obviously written by someone for whom English is a second language, or possibly third. So here's the process in a nutshell: 1) Turn on the monopod. There's a switch at the bottom. If the blue light is flashing it's charged. If not, use the enclosed USB cord to charge it. 2) Pair it with your phone. This means turning on the Bluetooth function if it isn't already on, and having the phone scan for available devices. Your phone should find it pretty simply. Mine did. 3) Mount the phone in the cradle. If it doesn't fit securely you can use the gasket, though I have no idea how it works. My phone didn't require it. Good luck with that. 4) Attach the cradle to the arm. 5) Set your camera to Selfie! 6) Fiddle with the length of the arm and angle of the cradle until you're happy. This could take an hour if you're picky. 7) Once you've got the photo you want framed in the camera, press the conveniently located button on the handle. 8) Marvel at how well that really works. You're welcome. I can see carrying it on a trip, that makes perfect sense. But to carry it with you on a day-to-day basis? Not so much. This is not something you cart with you to your favorite club so you can take selfies with your gang to show the world how much fun you're having. It won't fit comfortably in a pocket or a small purse. So it's pretty much limited to travel functions, which is fine, there's nothing wrong with that. $25 isn't a bad price for something that makes your smart phone more useful. But I question the need for a special device just to take selfies, even if you are on a trip. I wish it had been built to function as a tripod as well as a monopod. That would have made it all that much more useful for travelers, helping to steady the phone while taking pictures. I took away one star for a combination of poor documentation and limited usefulness. More wouldn't be fair simply because this is only my opinion on both. There are no real problems that I can point to. I would say that you give it some thought, and if you feel you'll get a lot of use out of it, then buy with confidence because it really is a fun gadget. And you might just surprise yourself and your friends and family at what cool pictures you're taking.

Using your imagination, the versatility of this gadget is almost limitless. It's designed to help people take better selfies with their smart phones by extending the distance from the phone's camera lens more than another arm's length. After charging this device for about half-hour with the USB cable supplied (you'll need your own USB charger), it took me only a few seconds to make a Bluetooth connection with my Motorola Droid Razr MAXX HD smartphone. Once the Bluetooth connection is made, a button on the handle of this gadget reliably trips the phone's camera shutter. Then the fun begins. The solid telescoping rod, with a comfortable handle on one end and an adjustable tripod-like bracket on the other, extends from its compressed length of 9 1/2 inches to 40 inches. The cellphone bracket adds another four inches or so when it's attached. I found that the cellphone bracket held my phone securely whether or not I used the orange doohickey shown on the product's Web page. Naturally, the first thing I did was to take an indoor selfie with my phone, which gave me excellent results. Next, I went outdoors, posed with my stepdaughter and found that the distance that this device provided was almost perfect for a flattering photo instead of the too-close results that inevitably come from holding my phone at arm's length. Having a phone camera on the end of a 40-inch pole is not only good for taking selfies, it's also great for reaching over a crowd to take photos or videos that might otherwise be inaccessible. Want to photograph a flower growing on a tall bush or get closer to any other object with your camera? This device makes it possible to do that too. When the cellphone bracket is removed the standard tripod screw will secure a regular still camera or video camera to use this as a monopod or as an extension handle for those devices too. Since the USB charging port and on/off switch are on the end of the handle, it would be a good idea to find a crutch tip that fits the handle and protects those vulnerable parts when using this as a monopod. Thinking beyond holding the monopod to take your photos, the bracket that fits on the end of the monopod to hold a smart phone can also be mounted on a standard photo tripod. If you want to take large group selfies, just use the bracket to tripod your phone, aim it at your group in which you can include yourself, then use the Bluetooth trigger on the monopod handle to trip the camera shutter of your smart phone. Maybe your imagination can come up with more ideas. I've found this gadget more solidly constructed than I expected and much more fun than I anticipated. Unfortunately it's a bit large to fit in a pocket, but it could fit into a camera bag or woman's handbag. Therefore, having this available for self-portraits wherever you go is probably impractical. You'll need to plan ahead for your selfies, but this device will help you improve the results. A sample was provided to me in exchange for an honest review, which you have just read.

I got this in the mail and was the happiest camper ever. Worked perfectly fine for ONE DAY. ONE DAY I tell you. The next morning, woke up to take a selfie, the stick broke in half, when it was fully extended. MY phone dropped to the floor giving it minor cracks and everything. I was so disappointed. This happened a month and a half ago, but I decided to write a review about it now. Super upset with the results. See all 380 customer reviews...
